BISKINIK - The Choctaw news bird

On July 10 the Choctaw Nation Tribal Council approved a bill that corrected the spelling of the tribal newspaper, BISKINIK. Named after the little news bird of Choctaw legend, the BISKINIK has always been a free service to all tribal members and will continue to be a link among Choctaws wherever they live in the world.

The Tribal Council of the 1970s chose the name Biskinik for the newspaper since it was a news bird. Unfortunately, the spelling was incorrect by one letter. With the revival of culture and language, the Council passed legislation turning the H into a K so that BISHINIK is turned into BISKINIK.

The Legend

According to Choctaw legend, two birds – Biskinik (a small, speckled species of woodpecker) and Folichik (the scissortail fly catcher) were the only two birds to escape drowning during the "returning waters" (the Choctaw term for the Great Flood). In the Choctaw legend, when the great waters came crashing, there was a lone man, on a raft, who survived. Biskinik and Folichik accompanied this lone man, who floated on his raft for many moons. The birds became tired and perched upside down on the sky to rest. The waters became rough and the waves were so high that the waves reached the birds and actually split the tailfeathers!

After many days and nights, Biskinik finally brought the man a leaf from a tree and led him to land. When the raft was safely on ground, Folichik, turned into a beautiful woman. Biskinik remained a bird and always stayed near the camp, warning of danger and also bringing good news.

To the Choctaw, Biskinik, the friendliest of birds, was accorded special treatment and became known as "the little Chahta news bird." Biskinik would live around Choctaw homes and let them know whenever someone was approaching. The friendly little woodpecker was also believed to accompany hunting parties or war parties when they went into the field.

Biskinik would warn the warriors of the approach of an enemy, or would indicate to them when game was near and in which direction they should travel to find this game. Should an enemy force approach an encampment of Choctaw warriors during the night, Biskinik would warn them by tapping out messages on trees around the camp.

Not only is the tribal newspaper changing its name, but it is also stepping into the 21st Century with the development of an online version. The BISKINIK E-News will be available as a newsletter for anyone, members and non-members alike, to be received via email. Keep watching for an announcement for the kick-off of the BISKINIK E-News!

Chief Gregory E. Pyle and the staff of the tribal newspaper strive to bring news to each Choctaw about what other Choctaws are doing. Please welcome BISKINIK into your homes as your monthly "news bird" from other Choctaws.

Emergency Response Center opens in McAlester

By KAREN JACOB

Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma

On July 15, the Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma and the City of McAlester in a cooperative effort celebrated the ribboncutting of the new McAlester Fire and Emergency Response Complex. The 7,682-sq.-ft. facility is located at 607 Village Blvd. and will station not only fire trucks but also a HazMat

Response Trailer and an ambu-

"We have two manufacturing plants and our biggest plant is in McAlester. We are trying to create jobs for Oklahomans. We get the best training because you can only be competitive in this world if you have the best," stated Chief Gregory E. Pyle.

"This building is a joint venture," Chief Pyle continued. "We are building to last 100 years for our children and grandchildren. We want our children to stay here and have a safe environment."

Councilman Bob Pate honored Capt. Zappy Ott who died in the line of duty in 1981 while battling the Diamond Hardware blaze. Members of Captain Ott's family were present and recognized by his daughter, Sharon Evans.

Priddle stood up and said, "This is a day of celebration," and then spoke of a memo from representatives of the OSU extension office dated Feb. 14, 1985, that stated the need for a fourth fire station in the southeast quadrant of McAlester. Mayor Priddle said, "With the help of the Choctaw Nation 25 years later, this need is finally being fulfilled. Thanks to the tremendous efforts of our partner, the Choctaw Nation, the City of McAlester has a state-of-the-art emergency response center which will serve our citizens and our county for years to come." The $1.95 million facility was completed by using a $800,000 Community Development Block Grant obtained by the Choctaw Nation and a little over $1 million directly from Choctaw Nation businesses.

Wright City honors Oklahombi

State Representative Dennis Bailey, State Senator Jerry Ellis and Chief Gregory E. Pyle.

Oklahombi has been honored with a monument unveiled in his home town of Wright City. The granite stone is engraved "Joseph Oklahombi, 1895-1960." Oklahombi was born May 1895

Oklahombi was born May 1895 near Alikchi, Indian Territory. He moved to Bismark, now known as Wright City in 1910. He enlisted in the Army during World War I and was one of the original Choctaw Code Talkers.

On Oct. 8, 1918, at St. Etienne, France, Oklahombi and 23 fellow soldiers attacked an enemy position and captured 171 prisoners. They held the position for four days. For his bravery he was awarded the Silver Star from the United States and The Croix DeGuerre from the French Marshal Petain.

After the war, he returned to Wright City. On April 13, 1960, he was killed in an accident near his home. He was buried with military honors in the Yasho Cemetery northwest of Broken Bow.

Choctaw youth camps promote cultural enrichment, active lifestyles

By CHRISSY DILL

Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma

The Choctaw Nation has many organizations to promote the growth of their youth. Whether it is teaching them the Choctaw language or aiding them in furthering their education, it's evident that the Choctaw Nation cares about its youth excelling. The Summer Youth Activity Camps provide Choctaw children with opportunities to participate in various sports and activities, promoting an active lifestyle and productivity in the young population.

There are several Choctaw Cultural Events employees who are in charge of the camps. Kevin Gwin is the Youth Camp Coordinator, and he has been helping with the camps for the past six years. "I have always enjoyed working with kids," said Kevin, "so it was an easy choice when my executive director offered me this job."

Thank you

Dear Chief Pyle and the Choctaw Nation,

I recently graduated from the University of West Alabama in Livingston with a Bachelor's Degree in Athletic Training and I have passed the BOC (Board of Certification).

I would like to take this opportunity to say a "Thank You" to the Choctaw Nation for proto the Choctaw Nation for providing me with financial aid as I pursued my education.

A special thank you to Chief Pyle as he diligently works to move the Choctaw Nation to an upper-level of education which is the basis that any nation grows upon. I say thank you to Mr. Larry Wade, director of the Higher Education Department, and all of his staff who are always so kind, prompt and helpful.

I am the grandson of the late Sam Cook Palmer, the great-grandson of the late Ruby Cook Palmer, both of Preston, Miss., and the great-grandson of the late Peggy Garland Cook, an original enrollee from Stigler. My plans are to continue my education as I pursue my doctorate degree in Physical Therapy. Thank you and may God continue to bless the Choctaw Nation.

Red Earth Parade a success

June 18 was a significant time for the Choctaw People at the 2010 Red Earth Festival Parade. On that sunny and hot day in the midst of tall skyscrapers and the hustle and bustle of city life, the sounds of Choctaw songs came to life on the streets of downtown Oklahoma City. A delegation of Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians filled the air with traditional songs. The Mississippi women led the men carrying their stickball sticks as they walked behind the OK Choctaw Tribal Alliance float. The Choctaws of Oklahoma and the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indian united on one path to share the exhilaration!

Lil' Choctaws say thank you

Team Lil' Choctaws competed in the Creek Nation Jr. Olympics during the Creek Nation Festival. Sixteen kids participated in the heat of the day. Six kids placed first, two kids placed second, and three kids placed third in individual competition. The team would like to say thank you to District 3 Councilman Kenny Bryant for the donation to help purchase shirts for the kids. We would also like to thank Mr. Kimball of Kimball's Store of Talihina and thanks to Choctaw Travel Plaza of Wilburton for donating drinks for the kids. Again, thank you for all the donations and support.

Oklahoma competes in World Series Stickball

Enthusiastic team members are true Choctaw sportsmen

Chief Gregory E. Pyle greets the Oklahoma team.

From the desk of Chief Gregory E. Pyle

Oklahoma Choctaws made history this July with a team entered in the World Series Stickball Game at Mississippi. We were made welcome by our brethren in our ancestral homeland, as were Choctaws from all over the United States, as teams gathered at the football field at the Choctaw High School in Choctaw, Miss. Gaming Commissioner Henry Williams said that 30 teams would compete before the week was over in the single elimination tournament.

The Oklahoma team competed early in the week against "Unified," a diverse team of great players who ended the game in the double digits, while we cheered our team for their two points.

The enthusiastic and professional attitude of the men on the Oklahoma team lifted my spirits for the entire week! As they prepared for the game, I could hear them singing, chanting, yelling and tapping their sticks from over a block away! They ceremoniously marched up the street to the stadium, led by two young men with drums. All in bright turquoise shirts, many with matching bandanas and headbands, our team looked great, too.

This was my first time at the games, so when the Assistant Chief and I were asked to lead the team onto the field, we were honored and thrilled to participate. Still tapping their sticks, still led by the drummers, and still chanting and being loudly cheered on from the bleachers, our team marched three times from one end of the field to the other, continuing in a single file, then we were joined by our opponents who also snaked alongside our team on our journey from goalpost to goalpost.

This was quite a sight, as both teams had abundant athletes – some teams have more than 100 players so that the 30 who are on the field can continually be refreshed with less-fatigued team mates from the sidelines.

I was proud to have prayer asked for the team and the game. We always begin meetings at Choctaw Nation with prayer and I am thankful when we are at public events hosted by others and they have the same traditions.

Although we did not win the game, we were blessed to have no injuries. All that was broken was a pair of sticks.

After congratulating the Unified team, the Oklahoma men left the field, talking about all they had learned and how excited they would be to come back next year and compete again! These guys are true Choctaw sportsmen! I appreciate each and every one of them!

Imminent return of our Lord Jesus Christ

Our message for this month is on the "imminent return of our Lord Jesus Christ." First, let me share with you these words from the book of Hebrews 9 verse 27, "... it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment."

It is true that "it is appointed upon men once to die." We have seen this happen throughout human history. Death goes on. It plays no favorites. It claims both young and old, rich and poor, small and great, the wicked and righteous.

The Bible indicates that there is going to be one generation of believers who will never die. I am thinking of those who are living when Jesus comes, who in a moment, in a twinkling of an eye, in glorified bodies, rise to meet the Lord in the air.

Paul, in writing to the church at Corinth, in his first letter, First Corinthians in chapter 15 and verse 51, wrote, "Behold, I show you a mystery; We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed."

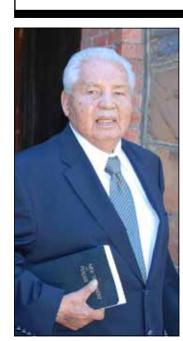

Then Paul assured us in his first letter to the Thessalonians that when the Lord Jesus returns, and we read in First Thessalonians 4:16-17 these words:

"For the Lord himself shall descend from Heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first.

"Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

These words not only indicate that some believers will never die but also suggest the imminence of our Lord's return and the translation of believers into His presence without ever dying.

Chaplain's Corner

Rev. Bertram Bobb Tribal Chaplain

Since the days of the Apostle Paul, he and all born-again believers have shared in that wonderful prospect that they might well be a part of that number who are living when Jesus comes, and who will never taste of death.

Paul wrote, "Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them ..." Can it be that the "we" in that verse refers to us today?

Are we that special body of believers who will hear the shout and be raptured into the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ without ever passing through the valley of the shadow of death? The answer is YES. It could be and may well be.

When we speak of the imminence of our Lord's return we mean that it could take place at any time. There is nothing at all standing in the way. This does not imply that He must come today, this week, this month, or even this year, but He may. He could return at any moment.

God so ordered His Rev-

God so ordered His Revelation that believers in every age could live with the expectation of the coming of His Son. The promises are so worded that every age may view the coming again of Christ as imminent, and receive the blessing and comfort of such a hope.

In view of all that is transpiring in the world today our generation has more cause to be excited about, and to look with more expectancy, the fulfillment of the promise of His coming than any other generation. Even though Christians in every century since the ascension of Jesus Christ have lived in the expectation of His return, we have three distinct advantages over those who have already lived and died - advantages which should make us more knowledgeable, and expectant of our Lord's return than ever before.

First of all we know that we are nearer the coming again of our Lord Jesus Christ than any other generation.

Secondly, we can enjoy, learn, and profit from the studies of outstanding Christian leaders dealing with the return of the Lord Jesus Christ. The prophetic Scriptures can be clearly understood from men like, John F. Walvoord, J. Dwight Pentecost and Charles C. Ryrie.

Then thirdly, we have seen things in our own day which bear a striking resemblance to the signs Jesus said would happen before His coming again when He personally returns to reign over the earth.

Those who lived in centureis past knew that certain events had to take place in connection with the Lord's return. Even though they could not explain just how or with what speed they might be fulfilled to fit into the program of the Lord's imminent coming. They just knew and had the faith to believe that somehow, some way, God's word would be fulfilled.

Today, we can actually witness certain developments and understand in the light of them how Jesus' coming could well be even at the door.

In our present generation, we can see a line-up of nations which could, almost overnight, develop in the revived Roman Empire. We no longer need to wonder how a man could become a world dictator.

The "signs of the times" as given by the Lord in Matthew 24, Luke 13, and Luke 21 relate to His glorious return. Not the rapture. They will mark the period between His calling out of the Church and His coming to rule. Some of the developments we see today suggest that the time Christ spoke about may be very near.

To the student of prophecy, the recent activity in Israel and surrounding Israel is of special interest.

Jesus Christ is coming again. It may be soon. Are ready? Do you know Jesus Christ as your personal Sav-

If you do not know Him, will you realize who you are, a sinner, realize Who God is and what He has done. He sent His only begotten Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, to die on the cross in your place. He was buried and rose again on the third day. Will you trust Him as your Savior? You do this by faith.

Working together to improve lives

From the desk of Assistant Chief Gary Batton

It is great to work for an entity and a leader who are always so positive about partnering to improve lives of tribal members, other citizens and communities around us. Just recently, the Choctaw Nation celebrated a partnership with McAlester for a new fire department. The tribe combined an $800,000 Community Development Block Grant (CDBG) and $1,150,000 in tribal funds to build a $1.95 million, 7,682-square-foot Fire and Emergency Response Complex on the southeast side of town.

We are extremely proud to be able to collaborate on this project that provides residents of the city and our tribal business enterprises in McAlester a safe environment. Although the Choctaw Nation constructed this much-needed facility, the City of McAlester will staff and maintain it.

Being toured through the fire station by Fire Chief Harold Stewart and the other firefighters was a great experience – they are all excited and appreciative of both the beauty and efficiency of the building. While on duty, the station is "home" to the firefighters. The dorm rooms and kitchen area are extremely comfortable, and the conference room doubles as a safe room in case of a tornado. In addition to the fire trucks, a Hazmat Response Trailer and ambulance will be housed in the new station.

McAlester is the second town in Choctaw Nation boundaries to benefit from a fire station built with CDBG and tribal funds. Durant opened a new station near the casino and travel plazas last year thanks to a partnership with that town.

Other big projects the tribe has completed in local towns to improve the community and the lives of people living there include health clinics, senior citizen housing, jobs through economic development (mainly casino and travel plazas), new tribal community centers and roads and bridges improvements. As Mayor Kevin Priddle said at McAlester, "It is amazing what you can do when you work together!"

Dangers of second-hand smoke

"Second-hand smoke" is the smoke you breathe when you are around any kind of smoker. It is the smoke that comes from the burning end of any tobacco product – cigarette, cigar, or pipe. It's also the smoke that the smoker breathes out. Non-smokers inhale the smoke when they're around smokers. There are 60 known and other probable cancer-causing substances in tobacco. It also contains 4,000 chemicals, including pesticides and many poisons.

Second-hand smoke has stronger concentrations of some of these harmful substances that what the smoker inhales diectly.

Second-hand smoke can cause many health risks. For instance, smoke can harm the heart. Anyone who lives with a smoker is at risk for developing lung cancer or even having a heart attack.

Inhaling second-hand smoke is especially dangerous for babies and young children. Their lungs are delicate and still developing. The smoke makes their lungs less able to completely fill with air.

Children exposed to smoke are more likely to get sick. They may get more colds and ear infections from fluid buildup in their middle ears.

Children can develop pneumonia, asthma, bronchitis and other lung infections. They may develop allergies. If a child has asthma, it may get worse.

As a parent, what can you do?

- You should not smoke while you're pregnant. If you smoke, the baby smokes, too.
- Ask your partner not to smoke around you while you're pregnant.
- Women who smoke or are exposed to smoke are more likely to have a low birth weight baby. If you are smoking ask your health care provider about stop-smoking aides.
- Ask your partner or other family members to go outside your home to smoke.
- Let them know that any smoking in the home increases the risk of SIDS (Sudden Infant Death Syndrome).

We all want the best for our babies and children. One of the best gifts you can give your child is to keep them away from second-hand smoke.

Make the right food choices for a healthier lifestyle

■Step up to nutrition and health

The food and physical activity choices made every day affect your health and how you feel today and in the future. Eating right and being physically active are keys to a healthy lifestyle. The Dietary Guidelines for Americans, 2005, can lead the way to a healthier you.

■Make smart choices from every food group

Give your body the balanced nutrition it needs by eating a variety of nutrition-packed foods every day. Just be sure to stay within your calorie needs.

A healthy eating plan:

- > Emphasizes fruits, vegetables, whole grains, and fatfree or low-fat milk and milk
- products.

 > Includes lean meats, poultry, fish, beans, eggs and nuts.
- > Is low in saturated fats, trans fats, cholesterol, salt and added sugars.

Choose the most nutritionally rich foods you can from each food group each day – those packed with vitamins, minerals, fiber, and nutrients but lower in calories.

- > Focus on fruits. Eat a variety fresh, frozen, canned or dried. For a 2,000 calorie diet, you need two cups of fruit each day.
- > Vary your veggies. Eat more orange and dark vegetables such as carrots, sweet potatoes, broccoli and dark, leafy greens. Include beans and peas such as pinto beans, kidney beans, split peas and lentils more often.
- > Get your calcium-rich foods. Have three cups of low-fat or fat-free milk or an equivalent amount of low-fat yogurt and/or low-fat cheese every day (1 1/2 ounces of cheese equals 1 cup of milk).

- Make half your grains whole. Eat at least three ounces whole-grain cereals, breads, crackers, rice or pasta every day. Look to see that grains are refered to as "whole" in the list of ingredients.
- > Go lean with protein. Choose lean meats and poultry. Bake, broil or grill it. And vary your protein choices with more fish, beans, peas, nuts and seeds.

Find your balance between food and physical activity. Regular physical activity, at least 30 minutes a day, is important for your overall health and fitness – plus it helps control body weight, promotes a feeling of well-being and reduces the risk of chronic dispasses

For even greater health benefits and to help control body weight, be physically active for 60 minutes.

provider about stop-smoking Time for back-to-school immunizations

The Oklahoma State Department of Health reminds you that now is the best time to check your child's immunization record and schedule a visit with your health care provider or local county health department to obtain any vaccinations needed for school.

This is the best time because clinics only get busier as the start of the school year gets closer. The demand for vaccines turns into a rush every year before school starts mainly because of the boosters due for children entering kindergarten.

Children in Kindergarten through the 12th grade are required to have the primary series of the following vaccines: DTaP (4 doses), polio (3 doses), MMR (1 dose), hepatitis B (3 doses), hepatitis A (2 doses) and varicella (1 dose) and booster doses of DTaP and polio vaccines and a second dose of MMR. A second dose of varicella vaccine is also recommended at 4 to 6 years of age, but is not required in Oklahoma.

If a child is behind with his or her vaccinations, they can catch up. Children can start school as long as they are in the process of complying with the requirements.

Parents of children who haven't completed the required series and boosters should obtain a schedule from their doctor or clinic that shows the dates when they will receive the rest of the doses. Parents can then take the schedule to the school, but the children must be started on the series.

College students in Oklahoma are also required to present vaccination records. All college students are required to have MMR and hepatitis B vaccines and first-time college enrollees who will live on campus are also required to have the meningococcal vaccine. The college requirements do not apply to students enrolling only in courses delivered via the Internet or through distance learning in which the student is not required to attend class on campus.

Vaccines are also strongly recommended for adolescents and teenagers, although these vaccines are not required for Three vaccines are recommended for all adolescents at ages 11 to 12 and all teens 13 to 18 years who have not yet received the vaccines:

• Meningococcal vaccine to meningitis as the risk for this disease increases between ages 15 and 24 years.

• TDAP vaccine, a booster against tetanus, diphtheria and protect against four types of

- against tetanus, diphtheria and whooping cough, as immunity decreases over time.
- · HPV vaccine to protect against viruses that cause 70 percent of cervical cancer and 90 percent of genital warts in the United States.
- · A second dose of varicella vaccine for the best protection

These vaccines are available at county health departments, Indian Health Service and tribal clinics, and many private physicians through the Vaccines for Children Program. Adolescents and teens are eligible for this program through their 18th year if they have no health insurance, or are eligible for SoonerCare (Oklahoma's Medicaid program), or are Native American or Alaskan Native, or if their health insurance does not cover vaccines or does not cover a particular vaccine. However, once teens reach 19 years of age, they are no longer eligible for the Vaccines for Children program.

"Summer is a good time to check the vaccination records of everyone in your family. All adults need tetanus and diphtheria boosters every 10 years," said Dr. Lynn Mitchell, Chief Medical Officer and Deputy Commissioner for Prevention and Preparedness Services.

"So parents, check your records too, and get the vaccines you need along with those for your children. Kids may be less resistant to shots when they know grown-ups have to get shots, too."

Fruits and vegetables add tasty health benefits

Summer fun brings with it lots of wonderful food fair. From the healthy bounty of fruits and vegetables from the garden to the not-so-healthy foods from the deep fryers, the rich and creamy side dishes full of mayonnaise and the ice cream parlor. There is a lot to be said for eating our favorite foods in moderation, yet we should keep in mind the wonderful benefits of all the fresh fruits and vegetables of the season. In fruits and vegetables, as well as nuts and seeds, are found stanols. Stanols are plant-based chemical compounds which can help to reduce LDL (bad) cholesterol levels. Elevated cholesterol is a major risk factor for heart attack and stroke, which is the number one killer of all diabetics. According to the CDC, one in every six U.S. adults has high cholesterol and these individuals face double the risk of heart disease. This month's recipe gives us the summer fun of grilling out along with the tasty health benefits of fruit and vegetables.

Grilled Chicken with Green Chile Sauce Serves 4 eken breasts, 1/4 tsp. oregano

Grilled Chicken with (4 chicken breasts, boneless, skinless 10-12 tomatillos, husks removed and cut in half 1/4 c. olive oil 1/2 medium onion 2 limes, juice only 2 cloves garlic, chopped

1/4 tsp. oregano
2 jalapenos
1/2 tsp. pepper
2 tbsp. cilantro, chopped
1/4 c. water
1/4 tsp. salt

1/4 c. sour cream

1. Combine oil, juice from one lime, oregano, and black pepper in shallow, glass baking dish. Stir.

2. Place chicken breasts in baking dish and turn to coat each side. Cover dish and refrigerate overnight. Turn chicken periodically to marinate it on both sides.

3. Put water, tomatillos, and onion into saucepan. Bring to gentle boil and cook uncovered for 10 minutes or until tomatillos are tender.

4. In blender, place cooked onion, tomatillos, and any remaining water. Add garlic, jalapeno peppers, cilantro, salt, and juice of second lime. Blend until all ingredients are smooth. Place sauce in bowl and refrigerate.

5. Place chicken breasts on hot grill and cook until done. Place chicken on serving platter. Spoon tablespoon of low fat sour cream over each chicken breast. Pour sauce over sour cream.

Thomas earns college diploma

Thomas E. Davis, 61, was presented an Associate's Degree in Applied Science in Human Services on June 18 from Grays Harbor College in Aberdeen, Wash.

Davis hopes to earn a family wage income by being of service to his community as a Domestic Violence Advocate, Sexual Assault Advocate and employ the humanistic counseling approach to Emergency Disaster situations. Moreover, Davis is a registered counselor in the state of Washington with intentions of becoming a Chemical Dependency Professional at some future date.

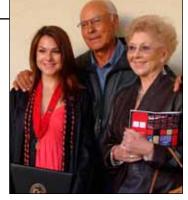

While earning his degree, Davis was Native American Student Association President for three terms; a member of the President's Scholars, which requires a grade point average of 3.5 or above; standing in Phi Theta Kappa Honor Society Membership; AutoCAD Certification; and voted the Teddy Bear Award by his constituent Human Service Club Membership. The graduating class consisted of 260 students and approximately 545 guests, faculty and family members were in attendance.

The ceremonies were conducted by President Edward J. Brewster; the Honorable Christine Gregoire, Governor of Washington; and Fawn Sharp, President of the Quinault Indian Nation and member of the Grays Harbor College Board of Trustees.

Davis was deeply humbled and honored when he received a card of congratulations postmarked in the state of West Virginia signed by Bettye Bolen, Career Counselor for the Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma Career Development Educational Assistance Program which stated: "The success of one inspires the dreams of many."

Congrats, Lyndsi

Former Okla Chahta Head Princess Lyndsi Riley graduated May 21 with honors from San Diego State University with a Bachelor of Arts in Liberal Arts & Sciences in Classics with an emphasis in Classical Languages. Her grandparents Chuck and Barbara Ishcomer and Aunt Tami joined with her mother in attending the commencement ceremonies and in wishing Lyndsi a very prosperous future. While earning such a prestigious degree, translating Latin and Greek text and participating as a member of Sigma Alpha Lambda, Lyndsi also competed for the San Diego State Aztecs as a member of the NCAA Division I Cross Country and Track and Field teams where she won Scholar-Athlete Honors.

Currently Lyndsi is in Greece, fulfilling the study abroad component of her degree. When she returns in the fall, she will begin studying for her teaching credential at Sonoma State University where she will also be competing once again as a distance runner on the Cross Country and Track teams for the Sonoma State Seawolves. An avid athlete and sports fan, Lyndsi's heart is to encourage young people to lead a healthy lifestyle and would someday hope to help implement a fun run at the Annual Okla Chahta Gathering in California as a way to encourage children of her own tribe. Lyndsi and her family are extremely grateful and appreciative to Larry Wade and the Choctaw Nation for their very generous support of her education.

Shelbie takes mission trip to Honduras

Shelbie Smith, daughter of Kristel and Layman Clay of Buffalo Valley, recently returned from a mission trip to Mision Caribe in Tegucigalpa, Honduras. Shelbie traveled with J.D. Miller, nationally known musician from Kentucky, from Houston to Tegucigalpa. The purpose of their visit was to conduct "Talento Cristiano Hondureno," a talent competition for the young people of the country. From the 90 contestants, a 12-year-old girl won with a song she had written.

Shelbie said, "The country is beautiful and the people are friendly. There are a lot of needs in this country, like clean water and reliable electricity. I had taken clean water, electricity and especially air conditioning for granted. We are really blessed here in the United States to have these things that are needed so badly in other areas of the world. I would like to thank my home church, Valley Christian of Talihina, Mark and Janet Layman, missionaries for Global Witness, J.D. Miller of Kentucky and the prayers and support of my family and friends for making this trip possible. I can't wait until I can go back again!"

Shelbie is a 2010 graduate of Buffalo Valley and has enrolled in Connors State College for the fall semester. She plans on furthering her education to become a doctor.

Their family is very grateful for blessings received this year after a terrible accident happened in which both of these children were injured, and hope that they are blessed with many more years to come.

Hooser honors his Oklahoma Choctaw heritage

By CHRISSY DILL

Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma

Ernest has a passion for teaching people about his Choctaw heritage. He shows an outstanding amount of honor for his history and he is proud of how his past has made him into the man he is today.

Ernest was born Oct. 8, 1917, in Tuskahoma. His father is the late Newton Hickman Hooser, coming from Missouri, and his mother is Helen Amanda Hooser. Ernest's mother is 3/4 degree Choctaw, which gives him 3/8 degree of Choctaw blood. Ernest grew up with his mother, father, two sisters and three brothers in Tuskahoma and attended elementary and high school there.

After graduating high school in 1936, Ernest headed for the Murray State School of Agriculture in Tishomingo and graduated two years later. He went on to Oklahoma A&M College (now Oklahoma State University) in Stillwater. He earned his bachelor's degree in math and science and started teaching in 1940 at Stigler.

On Sept. 21, 1940, Ernest married his college sweetheart, Helen Woolard, in Tishomingo. Helen was an artist and the years she was alive, they traveled across the United States and some foreign countries. Throughout their travels, she completed 2,600 beautiful paintings of our nation's landscape. Helen gave Ernest his two children.

Ernest's Choctaw family goes back to the Trail of Tears with his great-great-grandmother. On her journey on the Trail, she walked to Memphis where she had to share four boats with 2,500 other Indians. She walked up the Arkansas River where she encountered a winter storm. There were less than 20 tents for the 2,500 Indians. Most of the people were barely clothed and some were barefoot in the less-than-12-degree weather. According to Ernest, the "Trail of Tears" earned its name during this time from a Choctaw chief being interviewed at the Arkansas post. The chief said, "The way things look, it looks like a trail of tears." While Ernest's great-great-grandmother passed away on the Trail, her three sons survived to pass on the story.

Ernest still owns land in Tuskahoma, where he spent his days as a young boy with his brothers and sisters. His mother would send them on adventures to climb the trees that were near their home to retrieve the bark at the top. His mother would use the inside scrapings of this bark to make medicine. They would also dig up "snake root" to be used for medicine. "My parents didn't own a car until I was a junior in college," said Ernest, so they walked or rode their horses wherever they needed to go. They were a blessed family during The Depression because they had plenty of farm animals to keep them well-nourished.

Something important Ernest remembers his mother telling him and his brothers and sisters is, "You are going to college!" It was very important to her that they gain a good education, and that's just what Ernest did. He had earned his bachelor's degree in math and science from Oklahoma A&M College and went from teaching school in Stigler to becoming the high school principal in Tuskahoma in 1943. He became principal of Antlers High School in 1944 and earned his master's degree from Oklahoma A&M College in 1949. He was working towards his doctorate, but decided to focus more on his current career in education and administration. "I don't regret quitting pursuing my doctorate," Ernest said, and he soon became the superintendent of Eagletown Public Schools.

Four years after serving as superintendent for Eagletown, Ernest began teaching at Durant Jr. High School and made Durant his home. He still resides there today. He taught many math and science classes and eventually was put in charge of and directed an educational television station coming out of Durant Public Schools. "I really enjoyed the TV," Ernest said. "I enjoyed all of it." It was a television station for the students, by the students. Ernest enjoyed working with television production and attended some television teaching studios in east Texas for a time. He also worked at KXII Studios one

Not only has Ernest been involved with television, he's been a photographer as well. He developed his first roll of film in 1937. He has taught a night-photography class at Southeastern Oklahoma State University. He wanted to earn his living by doing things he loved, not working at something he didn't enjoy. With his work in teaching children, school administration, directing students in television program production and photography, Ernest is living his life doing the things he loves most.

Something that Ernest thinks is important to do is to read to children. "I have made an effort," he said, to read to all of his children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren. It brings him great pride for his children and grandchildren to say to him, "I remember you reading us stories." He now reads to his six great-grandchildren as much as he can. They say to him, "Big Papa, tell us stories!" According to Ernest, this fills him with pride.

Ernest loves reading to his great-grandchildren, but he shares his stories with as many people as he can. Since Ernest came to Durant in 1959, he has been close with the Choctaw Nation. "I tried to be involved in everything I could with the Choctaws," he said. Ernest has traveled to various schools and read Choctaw stories to students. "It's good for children to have people read to them," said Ernest. He has read both to elementary and high school students and enjoys teaching people about the Choctaw heritage. Recently, Ernest has been reading Choctaw stories to children in the Robert E. Lee Public Library in Durant.

Ernest encourages young people to go out and get an education because it will be very helpful to them later in life when they are searching for the right career. They should choose a career field they will love and enjoy so they will live a happy life. Ernest advises the youth of today to "study and know more about your people" by studying the native language and heritage. "I like for people to be proud of whatever they are," he said, even if they're not Choctaw.

Ernest Hooser is an honorable Choctaw elder who is admired by many. Ernest Hooser was named an outstanding elder of the Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma in 2004. Ernest's brother, John Hooser, has also been named an outstanding elder.

He is an incredibly kind man who lives to love, learn and pass his wisdom to those around him. He has recently closed a speech, receiving a well-earned standing ovation by over 100 listeners, by stating, "I am a proud Oklahoma Choctaw Indian. I am a proud American Indian." Ernest shows pride for his Choctaw heritage in a way that deserves the utmost respect.

Durant High School alumni is baseball stand-out at OU

By BRET MOSS

Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma

Oklahomans take pride in many things, and near the top of that list would be baseball and their University of Oklahoma Sooners. Max White, who just finished his freshman year at OU is an embodiment of this pride.

White, a 2009 graduate of Durant High School and member, plays left field for the Sooners and just returned from an impressive display of talent in the College World Series. Though the Sooners did not take the series, much hype has been generated in their favor and White has been recognized as an athlete with great potential.

"It is surreal," stated White as he described his first year and the media spotlight. "I remember the first game I started, I was named the OG&E Player of the Game... I was interviewed live on TV and radio."

All this attention has not hit White just yet and he describes it as still not feeling real. "It will probably hit me when I get older," White said when describing the experience.

Given his exceptional play over the season, there is now speculation that he could be considered for professional baseball. White commented, "There is a great chance for proball... I don't care what team I would play for, getting to the show is everybody's dream." White's dreams of proball might just come true if he keeps up his success on the field.

Max is not the only White pleased with recent success. His mother, Kim White, says, "It has been an amazing ride... we never dreamed he would do so well so fast." As Sooner fans, the White family was very excited to see their son make the team and obtain a starting position. "Everything you wish for when you are a kid, he is living that," asserted Kim.

White works as hard in the classroom as he does on the field during games and practices. A lot of practice, hard work and hours on the road filled White's freshman year at one of Oklahoma's top universities, but he still managed to do well in his studies and pulled off 30 credit hours over the year while excelling in athletics.

White looks back on his experience on the team with fondness. "Its like we grew up together, nobody thought they were better than anybody," commented White as he described the Sooner baseball team. "We were a close team and that is what got us that far."

White is back in his hometown of Durant for the summer. "I was supposed to go to Cape Cod to play summer ball, but we went so far in the series that I couldn't," commented White. His plans for the summer have changed to "hitting the weights pretty hard" and getting some rest for next season.

Remembering the road to his success, White looks back on high school and remembers Coach Zach Crabtree as an inspiration to become the player he is. "He made me a better person before a player," said White regarding his former coach.

His advice to high school athletes looking to venture into collegiate athletics is, "Don't take the time you have in high school for granted. Work hard with that time and you will be taken by surprise with what you can do."

College Prep Coordinator Stephanie Hodge Gardner is named Oklahoma's Rising Star

Stephanie Hodge Gardner, Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma Scholarship Advisement Program's College Prep Coordinator, has been named Oklahoma's Rising Star for 2010 by the Great Plains Association of College Admissions Counselors (GPACAC). GPACAC is a three-state (Nebraska, Kansas and Oklahoma) regional organization that is an affiliate of the National Association for College Admission Counseling (NACAC) a 10,000-member international organization.

GPACAC's Rising Star Award honors top individuals and/or programs in each of its states that exemplify excellence and dedication to serving the needs of students who are in the transition from high school to college.

The Rising Star award recognizes a young professional who has been in college admission counseling for less than five years and has shown leadership and commitment to the profession and to helping students with the college transition process, according to Barbara Adkins, Associate Dean of Admissions for the University of Tulsa and past president of GPACAC. Adkins nominated Stephanie for the Rising Star Award from Oklahoma.

"As a new member, Stephanie embraced our organization," says Adkins. "She went to our national conference, and also attended Guiding the Way to Inclusion (GWI) Workshop." GWI is a NACAC workshop that helps counselors assist underrepresented students and their families in the transition from secondary to postsecondary education. GWI is tailored to address current multicultural and diversity issues in higher education.

"Stephanie is a real go-getter and very dependable," says Adkins. "She jumps into any project that will help students and gives

Choctaw Scholarship Advisement Program sets date for third annual League & Friends

Saturday, Nov. 6

The Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma (CNO) Scholarship Advisement Program (SAP) has set Saturday, Nov. 6 as the date for its third annual Ivy League & Friends Choctaw Student Recruitment. The praise and feedback SAP received from past Ivy League & Friends sessions ensure the 2010 gathering of students, parents and the nation's top colleges will be an occasion CNO scholars from across the country will not want to miss.

Ivy League and Friends began in 2008 when Harvard University visited Durant to meet with nearly 200 Choctaw students and parents. The interest and response to the Harvard session prompted SAP to expand its 2009 event to include not only Harvard, but Yale, Dartmouth, Columbia, Penn, Johns Hopkins, Cal/Berkeley and Phillips Academy

• Added Grace

as well. More than 300 CNO scholars and parents from nine different states attended Ivy League and Friends 2009, proving beyond a doubt that the Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma's college-bound students and parents are eager for information about, and the chance to meet, America's top schools.

In 2009's post event survey more than 95 percent of respondents said they would be extremely likely to recommend attending Ivy League and Friends to a fellow CNO scholar. The highly positive feedback from last year also provided constructive recommendations that will make this year's Ivy League and Friends even better. Additions and improvements for 2010 include an impressive list:

• More Schools – It's anticipated this year's Ivy League and Friends will more than double the number of the 2009 attending colleges. SAP expects 20 or more of the nation's top colleges will attend. Schools and programs already scheduled to participate include Columbia, Johns Hopkins, Cal/Berkeley, Purdue and College Horizons. Harvard, Yale, and Princeton are among the group of selective institutions that have also been

• More Time and More Break-out
Sessions – Ivy League and Friends 2010 will be a full day, not just an evening affair. Students and parents will have time to learn more about each school and attend their choice of numerous special breakout sessions scheduled throughout the day. Sessions are planned for each college and university and much more time for one-on-one question and answer opportunities will be provided.

• Special Presentations – Breakout sessions will also highlight special presentations on a variety of college preparation topics. Look for sessions covering Financial Aid, College Test Preparation, Resume Building and more.

• Added Graduate Student Emphasis – Ivy League and Friends 2010 has more information and emphasis for graduate students. The event will include graduate student breakout sessions and many colleges will bring graduate student recruiters.

• Held at the Choctaw Casino Resort – Ivy League and Friends 2010 will be held at the new Choctaw Casino Resort in Durant, Oklahoma. The new Resort Hotel features over 300 well-appointed rooms and luxury suites complete with exclusive amenities. The Resort Hotel offers a business center, fitness center, retail outlets, shuttle service and, of course, access to Oklahoma's finest casino and entertainment experience.

Save the Date - Get Ivy League and Friends 2010 Updates. CNO students and parents are urged to save the date – Saturday, Nov. 6 – for the 2010 Ivy League & Friends. On SAP's Web site browse to www.choctawnation-sap.com/ivy for more information and updates. Also, be sure to check out SAP's Facebook, Twitter, online newsletter, and blog for the latest Ivy League & Friends news.

Koby Cross, First Place

I would like to thank the Choctaw Nation for the last four years of my high school career. Without the Youth Advisory Board, I would not have been able to experience the things I have. From compliance checks to New York City, I have enjoyed everything you have given me. I greatly appreciate the generosity which allowed us to participate in all the activities and trips in the last four years. The Choctaw Nation will only continue to grow because of the great leadership and willingness to make the Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma a better place to live. This scholarship will help further my education and the ability to give back to my community. The opportunities are endless because of this scholarship. I will forever be grateful for the financial support and endless life lessons I have learned because of the Youth Advisory Board. Again, thank you so much for the experience I would have never experienced on my own and for believing and investing in today's youth.

LeFlore County YAB hosts Senior Citizen Dance

The YAB of Leflore County hosted the second annual "Dancing with the Seniors Under the Stars" at the Oaks Nursing Home in Poteau. This was a evening full of fun, music and laughter for the YAB and Seniors alike. At the end of the dance, a dancing queen and king were crowned.

Brett Porter, Third Place

I am attending Southeastern Oklahoma State University in the fall, where I am majoring in biology. I will be a member of the honors program. After graduating I plan to attend pharmacy school. Upon completing pharmacy school I hope to have the opportunity to work for the Choctaw Nation. This scholarship will help me get out of college debt-free. I am very thankful that the Choctaw Nation YAB has the scholarship program.

Youth Advisory Board supports breast cancer awareness

The Youth Advisory Board members of Cameron High School planned and hosted a week devoted to Breast Cancer Awareness. This event, PinkZone, was held Feb. 1-5. Events that took place during the week were a poster contest, Support the Banks, where grades competed against each other to see who could raise the most money, and Tickle Me Pink Challenge, where students put money in faculty members' jars and the one with the most had to be completely decked out in Pink. On Friday the YAB hosted a reception for breast cancer fighters, had a pep rally in the gym, and encouraged all the fans to wear pink to that evening's basketball game. All proceeds made from events and T-shirt sales were donated to the Susan G. Komen foundation. The amount raised was $1,266.07.

The Choctaw Princess Pageants are a way to let the beautiful girls of the Choctaw Nation represent their tribe in a fun, exciting and competitive way. They show their pride for their Choctaw heritage through their traditional Choctaw talents, dress and speech. The women responsible for keeping these young ladies organized are Choctaw Nation Director of Tribal Events and Wheelock Academy, Faye Self, and her assistant director, Elaine Thompson.

Elaine has been working with Faye for about 4 ½ years. Faye became the pageant director about two months ago. "She has got such great organizational skills," said Elaine concerning Faye. It has been a quick learning experience for Fay and Elaine and they have really enjoyed it. They're always up for a challenge. "We're just motivated to make it better," commented Elaine. They work to make sure the pageants are right and fair to everyone, and put a lot of effort into increasing pageant participation.

These Choctaw Princess Pageants are held in all 12 districts in the 10½ counties of the Choctaw Nation. They are split up into three divisions; Little Miss, between the ages of 8 and 12; Junior Miss, between the ages of 13 and 17; and Senior Miss, between the ages of 18 and 23. All participants must have at least 1/16 degree of Choctaw blood or more, and they must be a resident of the Choctaw Nation.

The Little Miss competition consists of judgments based on beauty and personality, traditional Choctaw talent, their goals as princess and traditional Choctaw dress. The Junior and Senior Miss pageant consists of personality, goals as princess, beauty and poise, traditional dress and accessories and traditional talent. The winners of the district pageants will go on to compete for the title of Little, Junior and Senior Miss Choctaw Nation. This pageant is held at Tuskahoma on Thursday, Sept. 2, just in time for the Labor Day festivities.

Elaine and Faye are responsible for the behind-the-scenes action that happens while the girls are performing on stage. "My favorite part about the pageants is the girls' excitement and enthusiasm," said Elaine. "They show the culture of the tribe and the represent the Choctaw Nation." The toughest part, according to Elaine, is keeping up with all of the participants' paperwork.

Faye and Elaine have several duties as the pageant coordinators. They are responsible for meeting with the girls and getting everything set up for them. They get their rooms, food and other accommodations ready for the participants. They are there for the girls and their families when the phones are ringing off the hook with questions about the pageant. "We take care of their needs," said Elaine.

Currently, the 12 district pageants are all wrapped up and the princesses have been crowned. They are now busy preparing themselves for the Miss Choctaw Nation Pageant in September. Watching theses young ladies perform their Choctaw talents and showing off their colorful Choctaw dresses will give you pride for your Choctaw heritage. These girls are the youth of the Choctaw Nation and they display the Choctaw culture in a great way. If you're interested in participating in the Choctaw princess pageants, call Faye Self at 580-924-8280, ext. 2192, and be sure to come watch the Miss Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma Princess Pageant at Tuskahoma on Sept. 2. Connecting generations through flute-making

By LARISSA COPELAND

Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma

Almost all the tales from the different tribes about the origins of the flute say it was an instrument of love. The stories reference men playing the flute while courting a young maiden. "They played from the heart," says flute maker Presley Byington of Idabel.

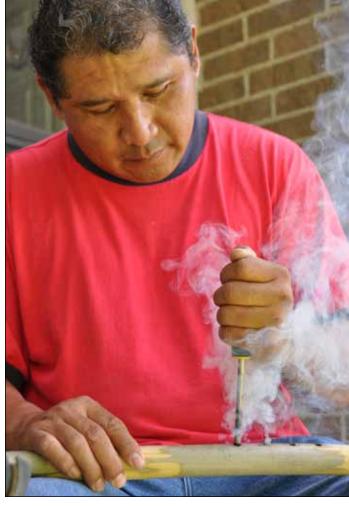

Presley, one of only a handful of Choctaw flute makers, has been crafting flutes from cane for about 20 years. While visiting Cherokee, S.C., as a kid, he saw and heard one played, and the seed of admiration was planted, continuing to grow ever since.

Presley has worked for the Oklahoma Forestry Department since 1992, but years earlier, when he went out on his own at 16 years old, he didn't have a real plan for what he wanted to do. Later, his mother asked if he wanted to apprentice Floyd Peters, a silversmith she knew. She offered to pay for his training and he agreed.

It was during his silversmith training with Floyd that Presley learned to make the flute. Floyd was taught the flute-making trade by a man who wanted to learn to be a silversmith. The two made a deal to teach each other their trades. So, as Floyd taught Presley the ways of a silversmith, he also showed him the art of flute-making as well. In the end, though Presley started out learning to be a silversmith, he became a flute maker instead.

When it comes to how he makes the flute, Presley takes the "think smarter, not harder" approach. Though he knows how to make a flute the way his ancestors did he chooses to take advantage of the tools of today when he creates one. "Choctaws are smart people. They use what tools are available to them," he explained. "If they'd had power tools back then I'm certain they would have used them. My process is different but it's the same were made of switch cane or river cane and they were made with only two holes. In earlier Choctaw tales, this type of flute was usually played by the medicine men, or holy men, of the tribe during the game of stickball. Presley makes only a few of these flutes. More often, he makes the six-hole, Plainsstyle flute and typically uses bamboo instead. Over time, the Plains-style flute has been the style many flute-makers have adapted to, but the principles of both flutes are the same – to create beautiful music. He just prefers the sound that a bamboo flute makes over that of switch cane.

He cuts his own bamboo from a local patch in Broken Bow, owned by a man he knows. The man made a deal with Presley that if would make him flutes to give to his grandchildren Presley could use all the bamboo he wanted from the patch in exchange. Presley eagerly agreed and has used his bamboo ever since.

ers. When he does sell one it is Sometimes he is asked to set up a booth at festivals; however, he doesn't do this often. "I don't do it to make a living. I do it for fun and because I just like making them."

Presley also does numerous demonstrations for children throughout the year at various camps and school programs. Most recently, on July 14, he gave a presentation for kids at a summer camp at Beaver's Bend in Broken Bow. When he does visits like this he usually brings along two flutes to be given in a drawing - one for a girl and one for a boy. He gives away 10 to 12 flutes a year to kids in this way.

Presley is passionate about the Choctaw culture and does much to pass it on and educate the next generation. Not only does he make and play the Choctaw flute, he also does tribal beadwork, is a Powwow dancer, does acting portrayals, is a storyteller, and does demonstrations on other aspects of Choctaw culture.

He has even been asked to give blowgun demonstrations to classes at the University of Oklahoma.

He does all this because he feels like it's what he's supposed to be doing. "It just all fell into place. I'm supposed to be, well, I am an educator of our culture. I'm always willing to tell our stories," he explained. "It's so important that we don't lose our identity. You've got to know where you've been to know where you're going."

"Who we are, our blood, it's important," he said. "You have to have a want deep inside and hold on to it. We're a piece of the puzzle to connect the past and present culture," he continued, "and it's important that we keep passing it on."

THE PROCESS:

Transforming raw bamboo into an instrument

Presley cuts the bamboo and lets it dry out for about two weeks before it's ready to be used. Not counting this cutting and drying out process, it usually takes him about four to six hours to craft a flute.

Native American flutes have two air chambers, however, the piece of bamboo has three sections separated by two dividers. It's important to pop out the divider between the lower bamboo joints while it's still green; otherwise, if it's dried out the piece is likely to crack. If he doesn't get it out while it's green he burns it out when it dries by heating a long metal pick and burning through the divider. The divider in the top is left in place.

Next he rough sands the piece to remove the outer skin.

He uses a pencil and marks a line down the front and back of the bamboo, and in front and behind the node (joint) that still has the divider intact. He makes six pencil marks along the top, measuring from the node, at 2-3/4 inches, 1-1/8, 1-1/8, 1-1/4, 1-1/8, 1-1/8. This is the only part of the flute that is measured; the rest is done by eye or feel.

Next, he draws the "duck bill" on the end of the flute then uses a hand saw to remove the sides. He says the duck or crane bill is in the stories of many tribes and is symbollic as a prayer for rain.

He then burns the holes into it by heating a metal rod and poking it through at the marks he measured off, saying drilling would cause it to splinter. The flute has eight holes burned into it - the six going down the body and two near the top on each side of the node.

The node "is where the music is made; it has to be just right," he says. He scrapes out a hollow area between the two holes to create the "saddle." This allows the air to flow out the top hole, under the birdie, or tuner, through the saddle and out through the bottom holes, where he manipulates the sound with his fingertips.

He holds on a test tuner to try out the flute. He blows in to test the sound. If it's not quite right he'll make a few adjustments, deepening the saddle by whittling out a little more. He'll test it again, continuing his fine-tuning. He can't say how he knows what tweaks to make; it's just something he can hear and feel.

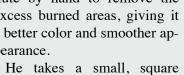

He then hand sands the rough edges and rounds off the

Using a propane-fueled flame, he "cures" the flute, starting at the ends. He scorches the bamboo to a chocolate brown color, which helps to crystallize the sap, making it harder, stronger and last longer. The sap pops out when heated and makes a crackling sound. He has to be careful about the amount of heat he applies so it doesn't crack.

He lets it cool for about 10 minutes, and then sands the flute by hand to remove the excess burned areas, giving it a better color and smoother appearance.

he wants to cut the birdie, then uses a band saw to cut it out. He sands the birdie by hand, rounding off the edges. He then places the birdie over the two tops holes already burned into the flute and sands it down to make a perfect fit. Each birdie is unique to the flute for which it was created.

He buffs each piece to shine and to smooth it out. He then burns his "mark," into the backside of the piece. His mark consists of his initials and the year on the outside of two crossed arrows. He started putting his mark on his flutes in 1998. A lady wanted a flute for her husband but wanted Presley to put his mark on it, identifying him as the artist who made it. Since then, every flute he creates carries his mark.

Last, he takes a long, thin strip of leather and wraps it several times around the birdie and the flute, tying it in a tight double knot over the node and

He does one final test. He puts his mouth to the top and out of the flute comes the smooth, unique sound that only bamboo can make. "Amazing Grace" is his song of choice. He sets it down, satisfied with the result. Smiling, he says, "Sounds pretty good, I reckon."

Preserving the past with photographs

By BRET MOSS

Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma

Throughout history, many men have left their mark on the world and are remembered through photographs. In the case of Chester Cowen, his mark is photographs.

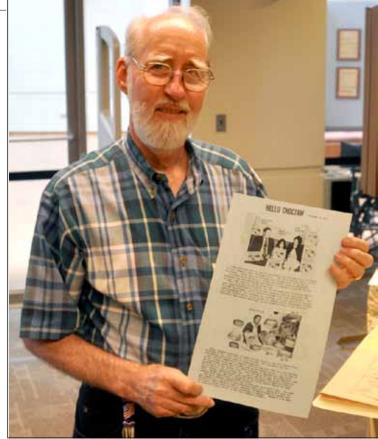

Cowen is the recently retired curator of the Oklahoma Historical Society's photo archives, a sizable collection of photographs that number in upwards of nine million. He has aided in the growth, organization and storage of these historical artifacts since 1990.

Born in Chickasha in 1939, Cowen is the son of Chester M. and Hazel Cowen. He attended the University of Oklahoma, where he obtained two baccalaureate degrees and a master's degree. He went on to Indiana University, where he completed the coursework toward a Ph.D.

Cowen is a member of the Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma and a member of the Choctaw Veteran's Association for his service in the U.S. Army.

After serving his country, Cowen traveled back to Oklahoma to study traveling photographers of territorial Oklahoma. He indexed photos and was able to date them by examining the type of print that was used, the clothes the subjects wore and the material on which the photo was printed.

Taking a trip by Oklahoma's capital building might lead you near the site of Cowen's life work. The Oklahoma Historical Society's new building called the Oklahoma Historical Center houses the photo archives, along with numerous other state artifacts.

When Cowen arrived to his job in 1990 at the Historical Society, there were about 64,000 images that he had to work with. Within the 20-year span, he has built the collection to over nine million, with an average of 475,000 new images per year.

With all these photographs under his supervision, Cowen has a sizable job to do in keeping up with valuable pieces of Oklahoma's history. The duties of Cowen, and the rest of the Historical Society is to date, sort, archive, preserve, and make available to the people all of the images in the archive. "It's a lot of work, but its what we do," said Cowen as he joyfully described his career.

When dating the incoming photographs, Cowen and his team use a wide knowledge of history and photograph expertise to determine the year it was taken. Some images can be dated without even seeing the picture, said Cowen. He went on to tell how one can greatly narrow the timeframe of the photo by just the texture of the photo.

When it comes to archiving and sorting the documents, Cowen and his colleges use a very detailed system to keep the photos organized and categorized. They are copied and referenced by year and subject matter. Along with the new building, came the ability for large scale scanning. All the images are in the process of being scanned and made available for the public.

All the images that have been scanned into digital format are available to the public to use for research purposes and are free on the website in

72 dpi. Higher quality images can be purchased for other use, and are available upon request in 300 dpi. To keep the photos preserved, the photos are carefully cleaned, put into sleeves that contain certain chemical qualities best suited for preserving the particular image and then stored in a dark room to prevent light determination. "These images will stay preserved for a very long time and we hope to have better methods in the future that will keep them even longer," says Cowen.

Cowen has had the pleasure of working with valuable pieces of Native American history during his career. He has archived the Will T. Nelson collection, whose "work was widely used for Choctaw purposes," said Cowen.

Nelson was a photographer who sent out a small publication titled "Hello Choctaw." This publication was admired by the chief at the time, David Garner, and was made permanent. "Hello Choctaw" later took a name change and is now the "Biskinik."

Cowen is now retired from his position at the Historical Society, but his work is far from over. In his retirement Cowen plans to publish a monograph on how to date family photos. He plans on having this work completed within two years.

Cowen also plans to keep studying images for the society in order to better preserve the history of the state. He has left his mark in history be preserving the image of Oklahoma. If the phrase "a picture is worth a thousand words" holds true, then Cowen has helped Oklahoma tell a nine billion-word

Five Tribes Story Conference planned for September

The Five Tribes Story Conference, hosted by the Five Civilized Tribes Museum in Muskogee, will be Sept. 24 and 25 at the historic Bacone College.

The purpose of the Five Tribes Story Conference is to create an annual event unprecedented in Indian Country. It will provide an enriching southeastern tribal environment; a joining of academic, interpretive, literary, and performance disciplines. Cultural performances and literary readings will be followed by academic-focused panels, featuring leaders in the four disciplines.

Stories, whether written, enacted, or illustrated, instill deep cultural connections. Intended to preserve, protect, and perpetuate culture. Stories build multi-cultural and multi-generational bridges and engage involvement.

Crucial to the effective impacts of stories are context, audience, performance, and intent. The conference will bring together tribal participants in the fields of history, ethnology, performance, and literature to discuss how each discipline informs the other. Sessions and panels dedicated to specific topics will engage participants in an open and interactive format.

Tim Tingle (Choctaw) will help co-host the conference and is the keynote speaker for Friday morning's opening. He is an award-winning author, storyteller, and folklorist. Tim travels the nation to schools, libraries, universities, museums, and tribal events presenting stories and cultural lessons gleaned from a lifetime of deep involvement in Choctaw oral history.

In addition to Tim Tingle, 15 well known authors, anthropologists, historians and storytellers will take part in the conference. The list includes: Choogie Kingfisher, (a Kituwah Cherokee), Ryan Mackey (Cherokee), Stella Long (Choctaw), Lorie Robins (Chickasaw), Greg Rodgers (Choctaw/Chickasaw), Phillip Harjo (Seminole), Richard Adams (Choctaw), Diane Glancy (Cherokee), Dr. Les Hannah (Cherokee), Linda Hogan (Chickasaw), LeAnne Howe (Choctaw), Dr. Phillip Carroll Moargan (Chickasaw/Choctaw), Dr. Daniel Littlefield (Cherokee), Joyce Bear (Muscogee), and Dr. Pete Coser (Muscogee).

The conference has a limited enrollment so plan to enroll early. Evening performances will held at the Five Civilized Tribes Museum and are open to the public free of charge.

For more information about the Five Tribes Story Conference visit fivetribestory.org, call 918-683-1701, or e-mail 5civilizedtribes@sbcglobal.net.

The Five Tribes Story Conference is made possible in part the Oklahoma Humanities Council and We the People initiative through the National Endowment of the Humanities.

OK Choctaws list August activities

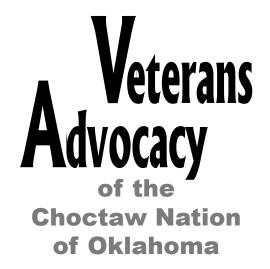

The OK Choctaw Tribal Alliance (OCTA) in Oklahoma City is having its August taco sale on Saturday, Aug. 14, from 11 a.m. to 2:30 p.m.. This will also include storytelling from about 11 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. by Greg Rodgers, a professional Native American storyteller, and a longtime OCTA member and former board member of the Alliance. The taco sales are held the second Saturday each month.

The Alliance is also planning to have a breakfast fundraiser the following Saturday, Aug. 21, from 8-11 a.m. The menu will include pancakes, scrambled eggs, bacon, sausage, biscuits and gravy, etc. In addition to the breakfast there will be homemade fruit pies for sale. Greg Rodgers will also be there with his storytelling again.

Also, the Alliance will have its taco trailer at Tushka Homma this year from Sept. 2-6 selling their Indian Tacos. The secret is in the soft bread and meat sauce. This will be followed by their monthly Taco Sale on Saturday, Sept. 11, from 11 a.m. to 2:30 p.m.

They just finished up a busy month in July with their parade float being in the Libertyfest Parade in Edmond on July 3, their monthly taco sale on July 10, serving Indian Tacos for the Synod of the Sun held at the First Presbyterian Church in Oklahoma on July 17, and having their taco wagon at the Indian Hills Powwow from the 23rd to the 25th of July in north Oklahoma City.

The Alliance is located at 5320 S. Youngs Blvd., in Oklahoma City, about five blocks north of Southwest 59th Street between May and Pennsylvania Avenues. For information about membership, contact Phyllis Been at 405-535-8418 (cell), or Judith Bryant at 405-755-6983.

OBITUARIES

Dale Allen 'Chuckie' Williams

Dale Allen Williams 58, passed away March 26, 2010, at his home in Peoria, Ariz. He was born August 13, 1951, at the old Indian hospital in Phoenix.

He owned and operated Choctaw Trucking for many years. He sold his trucks when diabetes got the best of him but it didn't slow him down.

He loved to fish, hunt and boat the Colorado River and area lakes. Chuck-

He was proud of his Choctaw heritage. He took his Pops to visit Oklahoma during his last years and visited all the important places in the Scott/Williams history. While there they dropped by to visit with Chief Pyle at his office.

Chuckie carried on the gift given to him by his father as a storyteller. His stories will be repeated by all who loved him. He was a lifelong resident of Peoria. He graduated from Peoria High School, played football and was on the wrestling team. Chuckie was a family man and he loved "his people." Those people included his family and many, many friends.

He was preceded in death by his parents, Frank Williams Jr. and Udell Scott Williams. He is a great-grandson of original enrollee Frank Williams Sr.

Chuckie is survived by his wife of five years, Susan; daughter Shannel Wells; granddaughters, Manaia and Nohea; son Billy; grandson Wyatt; brothers, Gerald, Floyd and Dan; sisters, Ruby Wilson and husband Del, Rachel Minor and husband Doug, Norma Gregg and husband Donny, and Sandra Howard; Jimmie and nieces and nephews.

His ashes were scattered over the mountains of the Smith River area of Montana.

James Finis Garland

James Finis Garland, born December of 1932, died April 17, 2010, at the age 77. He was born in Garland to Jim and Jewell Garland and in August of 1939 the family moved to Wasco, Calif. Finis attended local schools and graduated from Wasco High School in 1952 where he is remembered for his athletic ability in all sports. He married his high school friend and soul mate, Lilly Ferne Mears on Jan. 24, 1953.

He joined the Army in May of 1953 and served 19 months in Germany. He was honorably discharged in May 1955. In October of 1955, Finis began his career with Monolith Portland Cement Company in Tehachapi and retired in December of 1985. In 1987, he and Lilly moved to Santa Maria to enjoy retirement, where they lived until his death.

So many things can be said about Finis. He was a hard worker, always put his family first, and always gave a helping hand to others. He was a quiet man and no one knows all the things he did for others. His greatest pleasure was walking on the beach, feeding the squirrels and enjoying nature. He loved God, respected others for their beliefs and he also had a sense of humor.

His great-grandfather, Joseph G. Garland Sr., was Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the Choctaw Nation from 1891-1905.

Finis will be greatly missed by his loving wife of 57 years, Lilly Ferne; grandson Rodney Garland and wife Kristy of Bakersfield; great-grandchildren, Chyann and Joshua Garland; sister Ina Kay and husband Jim Bark of Pocola; and so many other relatives and special friends.

He was preceded in death by his parents; three sons, Randy Rodney and a baby boy; and his brother, Harold Garland.

DARE car wins award

By BRET MOSS

Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma

"We've actually had a truck driver call and ask if we could pull him over," stated Executive Director John Hobbs of the Choctaw Tribal Police Department. This truck driver was not looking for an encounter with the police, but for a picture of their squad car. The 2010 Chevy Camaro SS is definitely an eye-catcher, but this particular vehicle is a must-see.

In February, the Tribal Police Department of the Choctaw Nation invested in the visually appealing demonstration of American muscle. "I wanted something that was going to be different," stated Hobbs.

The vehicle is not just for looks and upholding the law, but is also used as an aid in teaching elementary children the harmful effects of drugs and how to avoid them. The Camaro is the Drug Abuse Resistance Education (DARE) car for Durant and the surrounding area.

The police departments that host DARE programs all have their own DARE cars, and they take a trip to Oklahoma City to compete in an annual event titled "Oklahoma DARE Officer Association Car Show," to see who has the best of the year. This year, Officer Nathan Calloway of the Choctaw Tribal Police Department took home the trophy for best car of the year with his Camaro.

DARE is a program that began in 1983 Los Angeles, as a result of the efforts of the late LAPD Police Chief Daryl Gates who wanted to prevent the youth from getting involved with drugs and other destructive habits.

Now DARE is a functioning program in all 50 states of the United States as well as in 43 countries worldwide. In elementary schools, the fifth grade classes are privileged with partaking in the DARE program and taught how to avoid substance abuse and the peer pressure that leads to it.

The DARE car is used to inspire dialogue among the DARE students. "It gets the kids talking," said Officer Calloway. "The ones that don't usually like to talk will begin to get involved," continued Calloway.

The DARE car is not just for show, it is very capable of getting the job done. The V8, 6.2-liter engine, 426 horsepower and 20-inch wheels enable this vehicle to reach destinations quickly when needed.

The looks of the car are almost as impressive as the machinery under the hood. Blue racing stripes down the center and tribal graphics and text on the side have turned many heads. "It gets attention everywhere it goes," stated Hobbs as he described the look of the car. One Stop Graphics of Durant handled the graphics, and Shipman Communication installed the patrol lights.

It's not just the kids of the DARE program that get excited to see the exceptional automobile, but just about every one who sees it can't help but want to see more. Officer Calloway tells of many occasions when the neighborhood kids will come to his door asking to take a look and a light display.

Whether catching the bad guy, winning the award, or helping spark interest in the classroom, the DARE car is something in which the officers and the community can take pride.

Choctaw Code Talkers documentary comes to public television in Fall 2010

Native American Public Telecommunications, Inc. (NAPT) proudly announces the release of a new documentary that examines the pivotal role that Choctaw soldiers played in helping shape an earlier end of World War I.

In 1918, not yet citizens of the United States, Choctaw members of the American Expeditionary Forces were asked by the government to use their Native language as a powerful tool against the German Forces in World War I, setting a precedent for code talking as an effective military weapon and establishing them as America's Original Code Talkers.

Co-produced by Red-Horse Native Productions, Inc., Valhalla Motion Pictures and Native American Public Telecommunications, Inc. (NAPT), "Choctaw Code Talkers" will transport viewers back to World War I for an intimate and engaging look into the lives of these brave men, their families, their dreams and their patriotism to a country who would remember them as heroes, but not until after their death.

"The government had sworn them to secrecy about what they did," said Evangeline Wilson, relative of Code Talkers Mitchell Bobb and James Edwards, Sr.

Choctaw Code Talkers is a follow-up to the award-winning documentary "True Whispers: The Story of the Navajo Code Talkers," a PBS nationally broadcast documentary produced by Valerie Red-Horse, President, of Red-Horse Native Productions, Inc. with Gale Anne Hurd, CEO, of Valhalla Motion Pictures.

"By launching the original concept of code talking for secure military communications, these brave Choctaw men laid the foundation for all other battlefield code talkers, including the Navajo, who were so instrumental in World War II. Even though it is overdue, nearly 100 years since their service, I am honored to be a part of bringing this important American story to the screen," Red-Horse said.

In World War I, by 1918, the German Forces had deciphered the Allied Forces' radio codes, tapped into their phone lines and captured messenger runners in order to anticipate the Allied strategies. The Allied Forces were desperate to attain secure communications and requested Choctaw soldiers to use their language to transmit messages in the field and from the trenches.

"This is an important story of heroic men whose wartime contributions helped to change the course of world history. Their Code was created while the men risked their lives fighting in Northern France during the fiercest and bloodiest battles of World War I. The Choctaw American Indian soldiers outwitted their German opponents, turning the tide of the War and ensuring the Allied victory," said Hurd.

Choctaw veteran chosen for Oklahoma Honor Flight

By LARISSA COPELAND

Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma

At an age when boys are usually preoccupied with things like impressing girls, doing homework and following their favorite sports teams, 15-year-old Isaac "Ike" Simpson of Hugo was making a decision that would change his life – joining the military during a time of war. In 1939, just out of the eighth grade, Ike enlisted in the Oklahoma Army National Guard and would soon be on his way overseas to fight for his country in World War II.

Following in his older brother, Edgar's, footsteps, Ike joined Company F, 180th Infantry, 45th Infantry Division. "The recruiter knew (that I was too young) but asked 'can you carry a rifle?' I said I could and he enlisted me right then," he said, setting in motion a journey of a lifetime.

Now, fast-forward 70 years. Ike was once again asked to take a trip because of his service to his country so long ago, only this time it included no bullets being shot at him, no danger of enemies, no weapon in hand. This trip was to honor him. Ike and 98 other World War II veterans from Oklahoma were selected to go on an all-expensespaid trip to Washington, D.C., on May 17 on the inaugural Oklahoma Honor Flight to visit the monuments and memorials dedicated to them, and all the men and women who served during the war.

Oklahoma Honor Flights, an organization made up of volunteers who raise money to charter the flights and cover all expenses for these World War II veterans, flew the group from Will Rogers World Airport in Oklahoma City to Washington for a rainy, but full day touring the sites. They visited the World War II, Korean War and Vietnam memorials, the statue of Iwo Jima, Arlington Cemetery, and while there, they witnessed the Changing of the Guard at the Tomb of the Unknown Sol-

Buses carried the veterans and their "guardians," persons tagging along to assist the group, to the memorials. Ike's guardian was Gary Banz, Oklahoma State Representative, District 101.

The visit, the first for Ike to the nation's capitol since traveling through on a troop train so many years ago on his way to prepare for the war and, ultimately, to the ship that would carry him to battle, was an emotional experience for him. "It brought back a lot of feelings that I haven't felt in a long time," he said. "It was very sad. It all comes back to you and takes you back to what you were doing during the war. I wouldn't have missed it for anything."

"I wondered if any of my buddies that were killed were buried there (in Arlington.) I never knew what happened to the ones that died," he said.

Ike, a private first class at the time the 45th was called up for mobilization in 1940, served as an infantry/rifleman. The Division deployed in 1943 to the European theater of operations, spending 23 days traveling across the Atlantic on a combatloaded ship to reach their destination. After landing in northern Africa, they continued to train for a week in preparations for their first combat mission, many of them not realizing the magnitude of it until after it was over – the invasion of Sicily.

Ike and his oldest brother, Edgar, were in the first wave of soldiers to come ashore during the amphibious assault. They fought bravely during the sixweek land battle throughout Sicily, where Edgar was injured and sent back to the United States to recuperate. (After healing, he returned back to combat to fight in Germany.)

"There was so little commo (communication) over there. We didn't have radios like they do today but we did our best to know what everyone else was doing," he said.

"Going in on the beach, I wasn't scared, not until the bullets whizzed by me or until I experienced the barrage of fire," he said, explaining the atmosphere. "It's scary but it's over with really quick and we'd be ready to go again."

On his next major mission, Ike was also in the first wave of the troops in the invasion at Salerno, Italy. He saw many of his brothers-in-arms fall in combat.

"It was had I lost a lot of

"It was bad. I lost a lot of friends, a few of them right beside me. I was just one of the lucky ones," he said, recalling many instances of "close calls" including once making it through an artillery barrage that took the life of his close friend and fox-hole buddy. "That one is still with me."

Truly an experience unforgettable, with emotion in his voice, he recalled some of the more intense moments he faced during combat, "It was scary but we just faced it. I had many close calls. We all did what we were trained to do in order to stay alive."

"I carried a BAR (Browning Automatic Rifle) for most of my time over there," he said, explaining one of his more vivid memories. "One night, I was supposed to go on a mounted patrol but a buddy who had a hurt foot asked if he could go on my patrol in the Jeep and I take his foot patrol. I traded weapons with him; I took his smaller M1 rifle and he took my BAR. On his way back to camp on that patrol, a German tank blew up all three vehicles in that entire patrol, killing them all," he continued. "God didn't want me to die that day. I carried his rifle for the rest of my tour."

"You don't forget those moments," he said, still affected by it all these years later.

"We didn't pay attention to the day or the time. We walked everywhere. We walked all across Sicily and Italy. I spent a year on my feet," he said. "But I made it home alive, both of us did, me and my brother."

Upon returning from the war, Ike stayed in the Oklahoma National Guard for two more years, being honorably discharged as a Sergeant. He got his GED and later attended Southeastern State College in Durant. He went on to play semi-professional baseball in Texas and Louisiana.

It was during that time that he met his future wife, Bobbie, a farm girl from Soper.

"When we met, he'd been all around the world and I'd never even left Choctaw County at that time," said Bobbie, thinking back of their chance meeting at a café in Hugo.

Shortly after their wedding Ike went to work for Choctaw Electric Co-Op, where he retired after 43 years of service.

Ike and Bobbie have been married for 54 years now and reside on a portion of his parents' original Indian land allotment in Hugo. They have two sons, Mike and Alan, seven grandchildren and 10 greatgrandchildren. With the exception of his time spent in service to his country, Ike has spent all his life in Hugo.

"I was glad to come home. I was glad when the war ended," he said. "There are a lot of stories from my time over there... a lot of stories."

Six summer camps are offered annually to Choctaw youth

With the help of his assistants, Kevin is responsible for setting up the dates, locations and times for all the camps. He's also in charge of ordering the sports equipment that is given to the campers and responsible for finding and hiring coaches.

"Over the years I meet lots of coaches," said Kevin. The Summer Youth Camps have responsible coaches and staff who are motivated to give the kids a good time while teaching them about the sport or activity of their choice. "When I tell the coaches what I do, and ask if they would like to help in the summers, they jump at the opportunity."

There are six camps offered to the kids. The camp that shows kids different aspects of the Choctaw heritage and culture, the cultural enrichment camp, gives them some exciting opportunities. The campers take part in stickball, archery, arts and crafts, storytelling and the Choctaw language.

Though the cultural enrichment camp gives campers the chance to shoot a bow and arrow and play some stickball, it's the golf camp that usually has the most participants. It's the staff and instructors' priority to teach each participant, whether it be a first-time golfer or an advanced golfer, the rules and game of golf.

"My personal favorite [camp] is golf," Kevin said, "because I love to play golf myself." The golf camp is also Kevin's favorite sport to put his coaching skills to work. "Because I play so much, I feel I can help all skill levels with something in their golf games."

The baseball and softball camps were conducted by former Division I players from the Big XII and ACC Conference in softball and top Oklahoma high school coaches. The players were coached in areas of hitting, pitching and fielding. Each camper was given the proper instruction that will help improve his or her level of play.

They were also shown how setting goals and self-discipline will not only help their playing ability, but help them in their everyday lives off of the field.

During the basketball camp, the campers learned fundamental skills of basketball to use throughout his or her school career with the ultimate goal of playing college-level basketball. They picked up tips from high school head coaches and former university play-

The football camp this summer featured the University of Oklahoma's Assistant Coach and Quarterback Coach, Josh Heupel, former Big XII players and former NFL coaches. The boys received instruction in areas of offensive drills, defensive drills and Sooner ball.

The Summer Youth Camps have about 2,500 kids participate each summer. The selection of activities, from learning the Choctaw language to hitting a homerun, give Choctaw children opportunities to have a fun summer learning more about the sport they love to play.

"I feel very fortunate to work for great employees at the Choctaw Nation," said Kevin. "Without everyone's help from my department and all other departments that volunteer their time, these camps would not be possible."

If you are interested in getting your child active next summer, the application deadlines for each camp are in April. Applications have to include copies of the child's Certificate of Degree of Indian Blood card and Choctaw Nation membership card. Saying, "I can't wait to see the kids again next year," Kevin is already anxious to get started for the summer of 2011. Whichever of the six camps your child chooses to attend, the coaches, along with the Cultural Events and Summer Camps employees, promise them a fun, active and educational time.

The process of making Choctaw traditional pottery

By DR. IAN THOMPSON

Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma

The main raw material in Choctaw pottery is clay, dug straight from the ground. When looking for a new clay source, areas where multiple layers of soil are exposed, such as construction sites, or the steep banks of streams are ideal. Clay can be nearly any color, but is recognized from a distance by its slightly shiny luster.

Good pottery clay is sticky workable, like Playdough®. English-speaking potters refer to clays that have this tight, sticky texture as being "fat." Interestingly, in the Choctaw language, the term for clay is "lukfi nia," or literally "fat dirt." In addition to having the appropriate texture, the clay must also have a low shrinkage rate as it dries, and the ability to withstand high heat without cracking or spalling. If a potter hasn't used particular clay before, the best way to evaluate these latter two properties is to simply make a small test pot out of the clay and see how the clay responds during the following production steps:

Once a clay has been located it is dug out of the earth by hand, and is then carefully cleaned of any roots, sticks, or rocks that may be inside it. This is often done by breaking the clay into small pieces and fishing out the foreign objects.

After cleaning is complete, the pottery-making potential of most clays can be improved by mixing them with amounts of clean, sifted non-plastic material, called temper. Tempering materials used by ancestral Choctaw potters through time include finely chopped organic material, such as pine needles, sand, burned and crushed limestone, crushed up pieces of old pottery, burned and crushed mussel shell, and burned and crushed animal bone. The addition of these materials opens up the structure of the clay, helping it to dry evenly. Temper particles also help to physically block any cracks that may begin to form in the clay itself. The amount of temper that is added depends on the type of material being used and the quality of the clay itself. In general terms, the more temper that is added to the clay, the less likely a pot made from it will crack. Sandy, organic clays may require very little temper, while some of the very sticky clays from the Red

Clay creations a passion for McMahon

By LISA REED
Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma

Brown eyes crinkle as Mary McMahon laughs and says that the old adage, "Idle hands are the devil's playground," will never apply to

She sits at her dining room table which is covered with traditional Choctaw pottery and describes the pleasure she derives from the creations, beginning with the hunt for the perfect clay.

"Everyone calls us clay hounds," she says. Her husband, Dan, nods in agreement.

The two travel all over southeastern Oklahoma with shovels and buckets. They bring home black clay from Talihina, yellow clay from Atoka, red clay from Yanush, and were excited to find a whole ribbon of white clay near McAlester.

"The white is hard to find," Mary said, describing the way it ran – a ribbon of red, a ribbon of white, another ribbon of red. "We found it by the lake and asked the people who lived there if we could get some of it."

Bags of clay are labeled with where the McMahons found it and are stored in a back room of their home. Some were brought to them by their instructor, Ian Thompson, and are marked with "Louisiana," "Mississippi," "Alabama," and "Tom, Okla." The McMahons in turn share their clay with other class members.

"We think the clay from Mississippi will fire pink," Mary says, holding up the bag full of a definitely pink-tinted clay. She can't wait to get started on it.

The McMahons began taking traditional Choctaw pottery classes in December 2009. Dan enjoys it. Mary is passionate about it. She has created over 60 pots in the seven months since starting the class.

"My sister told me about the classes and at first I thought, 'that isn't for me,' but after the first class I knew it was something I wanted to do," she says. "There is no end to what you can do with the clay."

Her beginning work is a bit rough around the edges but the progress is obvious as she points out the first pinch pot and then her newer pots. There are pitchers, bowls with handles, bowls with lids, small ones, large ones, and her pride-and-joy – a beautiful gray pot with a neck that stands about 9 inches tall.

A few of the pots have cracks, but Mary assures there is still a use for them. Broken pots are used to fire the good pots, she explains.

"It takes about 3 to 4 hours to make a pot," Mary says. "First you have to pick all the little rocks from the clay. I use about as much clay as you can put in a butter tub – about half clay, half sand and mix it until it feels right."

Mary painstakingly etches Choctaw designs on the pots. She traces the patterns in the clay and repeatedly goes over them so they will endure the firing. The patterns provided by Thompson depict those on ancestral Choctaw pottery found in Moundville, Ala.

Mary describes her pottery as a hobby, a pastime, but it has become a legacy she shares with others. One of her granddaughters, Brittany Wilson, spent a Sunday afternoon learning a portion of Choctaw heritage from Mary. Brittany's pot sits with Mary's waiting for the firing planned in August.

"It is so rewarding," Mary says. "I look at a pot and think, 'I used a piece of clay and made that'"

The class meets every other Monday night at the Choctaw Nation Community Center in Poteau. Each class lasts 4-1/2 hours. The McMahons enjoy meeting new people and have made a lot of new friends. They share home-cooked food and stories while learning a time-honored tradition. They often stay past the scheduled time to just visit.

Mary looks forward to moving on from bowls to pots and pans in pottery class. And she would like to learn to make baskets ... and beadwork.... There are so many fun ways to keep her hands busy.

River are able to take as much as 50 percent temper. For pots that are to be used for eating or serving food, the temper material is usually ground into a powder. Pots that are to be used for cooking usually have larger temper particles.

The clay and temper are thoroughly mixed to form a clay body. For hundreds of years, our Choctaw ancestors used several techniques to shape a clay body into a pot. The most basic method was to form the clay body into a ball, stick a thumb into the ball, and then begin pinching and turning the clay to make a "pinch pot." Our ancestors also made "coil pots" by rolling the clay body into thin coils, or snakes, and then layering them on top of each other to make the pot's basic shape. The coils were then pinched together and often beaten with a small paddle to compress them. Our ancestors also made pottery using a mold technique. For this, the clay body was simply pushed into a shallow dish, taking on the shape of that dish. The walls of the new pot could be shaped by pinching or adding coils to this base. At some times and places, our ancestors made pottery by rolling the clay body out thin like cookie dough, cutting it into the desired shape, and then rolling or folding it up to form a pot.

After a pot is made, it is allowed to dry, slowly and evenly in a dark, cool place. This usually takes a couple of weeks for an eating bowl-sized piece. When an eating or serving bowl is halfway dried, it can be burnished, by rubbing a smooth, round stone quickly over its surface. This aligns the tiny clay particles and can make the pot shiny enough to give a reflection. Cooking pots were left with rough textures. Designs are often scratched into eating and serving bowls with sharp objects. At the Trail of Tears time period, Choctaw potters made distinctive designs by scratching broken sections of combs across the clay, making intricate parallel lines.

Firing is done on a dry, calm evening, on a piece of ground that is sheltered from any unexpected wind gusts that may come up. The method we use in Choctaw traditional pottery class has been reconstructed from the best available information about how our ancestors fired their pottery. First, the sod is carefully scraped from the ground. Then, the soil is turned over with a shovel, just like in a garden. A large fire is then built on top of the churned soil. When the fire burns down to coals, these coals are churned down into the soil, and another fire built on top. The heat on top of and inside of the soil dries it out, and makes it look like cinnamon or cocoa powder. If this is not done before firing, the heat from the fire will cause the ground to give off water vapor, which will enter the pots and make them crack.

After the ground is dried, broken pieces of pottery are laid over the surface of the hot, dry dirt, creating an isolative layer. The pottery to be fired is placed on top, and slowly begins to heat. Slow heating helps minimize the chance of cracks. After some time, a ring of fire is kindled around the heating pots, causing their temperature to slowly and evenly raise higher and higher. Over the course of an evening, the ring of fire is slowly scooted closer to the pottery, until it begins to touch it. Finally, using thin pieces of wood, the fire is built right over the pottery. As this wood burns, it turns to coals that fall down around the pots, heating them still higher.

Our ancestors used the changing colors of the pottery to gage its temperate. During the firing process, the pottery will first turn a dark color as the clay absorbs the smoke from the fire. Next, it turns a light color as the pot gets hot enough to burn the smoke out of it.

At a still higher temperature, the pot will begin to glow a red color. At this stage, the edges of the clay particles have fused together, functionally firing the pot and making it useable. Clay bodies that have shell, bone, or limestone temper must be heated no hotter than glowing red. Clay bodies tempered with sand can be heated hotter, to glowing orange.

If the fire is allowed to die down naturally around the pots, they will end up with light and dark fire clouds on them. If the pots are removed from the fire while still glowing, they will end up a solid light color. The pots can also be smudged a solid black color by allowing the fire to burn down until it is nearly out, then piling it with dry corn cobs or some other smoky material, and allowing it to smoke, putting out any flames that may rekindle.

The next morning, the pots can be taken from the firing area, inspected for cracks, carefully washed, and then used.

Wedding to honor native culture

Couple plans special day during this year's Labor Day Festival

By BRET MOSS

Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma

"It's important to be proud of who you are," stated Debra Belt as she reflected on her Choctaw heritage. She will display this pride on one of the most anticipated days in a person's life – her wedding day.

Debra Ann Belt, 26, of Oklahoma City, will marry her fiancé, Erik Estrada Garcia, in a traditional Choctaw wedding ceremony on Sept. 2, 2010, at the Choctaw village in Tushka Homma. She believes that in having a traditional Choctaw wedding, she and her future husband will be honoring their native culture in a meaningful manner.

Erik, age 24 and a Mississippi Choctaw, met Debra in Tushka Homma during the Labor Day festivities of 2006, where they began their journey toward wedding bells. After Erik met Debra, he fell in love, which led him to proposing in 2009, during the social dancing of the Labor Day festivities.

The wedding will consist of many Choctaw traditions, the first being, "The Choctaw Wedding Chase." In this event, the bride will run towards a pole as the groom chases her. If he can catch her, there will be a wedding, but if she reaches it before he catches her, everyone goes home. Other events at the wedding consist of: Choctaw gift giving, Choctaw social dancing and a piñata to celebrate Erik's Mexican heritage.

"Erik and I notice that many young people are not interested in learning their Choctaw traditions or culture, so by having a wedding that will consist of Choctaw traditions, we hope to inspire young and old alike to learn more about their Choctaw culture, and hopefully other couples who are planning to marry will want to include some of these Choctaw wedding ceremonies in their wedding, " stated Debra.

This will not be the first occasion in which Erik and Debra display their Choctaw heritage. Both are avid traditional Choctaw dancers. As they dance in pow wows and many other social occasions, it is easy to see that Choctaw runs through their blood.

Erik has been dancing in social dances since he was five. His family also has a dance troupe in Mississippi. Erik also enjoys the longtime favored Choctaw sport of stickball, and he plays on many occasions, including the Labor Day games and Mississippi games.

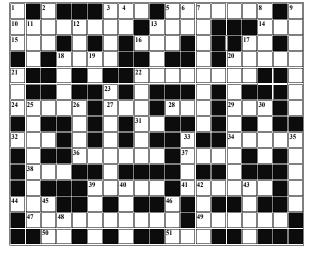

Debra has been dancing in pow wows for about seven years. She was the Oklahoma City Pow Wow Club Princess in '07 and '08. She also teaches beadwork at the Oklahoma Choctaw Alliance.

The couple's future plans consist of starting a photography business. Debra is certified in photography and Erik plans to attend Oklahoma City Community College to obtain his associate's degree in photography as well.

Erik is the son of Robert and Madie Garcia and the descendant of Lilly Mae Billy, an original Mississippi Choctaw. Debra is the daughter of Laura Belt and the late Elvis Belt. She is also the great-granddaughter of Elizabeth Cole Bully-Pistubbee, an original enrollee of the Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma.

The wedding will begin at 2 p.m. starting with the Wedding Chase. The ceremony will follow, with Olin Williams ministering. There will be a reception shortly after the ceremony.

Answer in September BISKINIK

Thank you, Chief Aufaumatauba's daughter

For this month's edition of Iti Fabvssa, we are diverging slightly from our usual format. Rather than responding to a written-in question, we are taking this opportunity to make our readership aware of the positive things that a very special Choctaw woman has been doing for the Tribe over the last month and also to thank her.

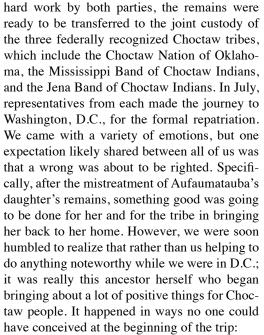

We can't give you this woman's name, but she is the daughter of Choctaw Chief Aufaumatauba. She was born in what is now southwestern Alabama, in the Oklahannali or "Sixtowns" District of the Choctaw tribe, sometime around the year 1800. She grew up and lived there with her community until her untimely death in her mid-20s. Her loved ones laid her remains to rest in a small earth mound, intending for them to slowly return to the earth in peace.

Around that time, Choctaw leaders at the tribal level ceded this land to the United States in the Treaty of Hoe Buckintoopa (or "Hobvk Itopa"). As a result, this woman's community had to leave her burial behind, and in time, many of those who knew her were probably forced to emigrate to Oklahoma on the Trail of Tears. A United States arsenal was soon built near her

As happens much, much too often to our Choctaw ancestors, without family or friends in the area to actively watch and protect her grave, this woman's bones were dug up by a collector as a kind of morbid trophy. They were then shipped to the eastern United States, and spent 140 years in collections, eventually ending up at the Smithsonian Museum of Natural History. From the traditional Choctaw perspective held by this woman when she was alive, a perspective that is still held by many tribal members today, such grave desecration is one of the most despicable and hurtful offenses that can be done to a person or a community.

For a long time, tribal people had no recourse for righting such wrongs. However, beginning in the late 1980s, Native American organizers and lawmakers helped bring about legislation that makes it possible for tribes to reclaim and repatriate the remains of their ancestors from among the tens of thousands of Native American human remains held in the collections of federally funded institutions. In 2004, the Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma and the repatriation staff at the Smithsonian National Museum of Natural History (one of whom is herself Choctaw) began cooperatively working on the long documentation process that would make it legally possible for the museum to return Aufaumatauba's daughter's remains back into Choctaw control.

This sumafter mer, six years of

The three federally recognized Choctaw tribes have been separated since the Trail of Tears. However, Aufaumatauba's daughter lived before this imposed separation and is potentially ancestral to all three groups. Because of this, representatives from each of these Choctaw tribes came to D.C. working together as one. During this contact, a recurring topic of discussion concerned the ways that the historic preservation departments from the three tribes can work to help each other on a variety of issues. Joint cultural activities were planned that will continue to bring members from each of these tribes together in the future.

Over the week, the Choctaw representatives were allowed to view the Choctaw collections in the National Museum of Natural History and National Museum of the American Indian. We saw and handled hundreds of non-burial Choctaw items made by our ancestors more than a century ago including blowguns, moccasins, bows, arrows, pottery, baskets, beadwork, drums, stickball sticks, baskets and much more. These objects represent the traditional knowledge developed by our ancestors, and were an important part of their Choctaw identity. In viewing these collections, a great deal of information on Choctaw history and traditional lifeways was beshared tween the three Choctaw tribes and the Smithsonian staff, with everyone learning a tremendous amount about the lives of our ancestors. Representatives from Choctaw Nation formally documented many of the pieces in these collections, making it possible for representatives from each of the Choctaw tribes to have hundreds of photographs and other information to share with tribal members back home.

During the visit, the Smithsonian staff informed the Choctaw representatives about the programs and funding that could potentially help our tribes to set up education programs to strengthen our traditional culture and arts. They also told us about the possibility of the Smithsonian loaning some of its Choctaw collections to tribal museums such as at the Tushka Homma Capitol, so that more Choctaw people can see these Choctaw national treasures. We were additionally made aware of potential opportunities for other tribal representatives to one day come to D.C. to study the Choctaw collections, and of programs to assist budding Choctaw artists. Each of these has the potential to bring the Smithsonian and the Choctaw tribes in mutually beneficial partnerships that could help both well into the foreseeable future.

As we left Washington, D.C., we were humbled and amazed by all that Chief Aufaumatauba's daughter had brought about for Choctaw people living today ... She wasn't done yet. The reburial brought Choctaw Nation staff to Alabama, and into cooperation with the MOWA Band of Choctaw Indians, who still reside in the state. Again, relationships were created there that will help to bring Choctaws together into Moreover, on our way to meet the MOWAs, we had the opportunity to visit the Alabama State Archives, in Montgomery, Ala. This collection houses the unpublished manuscripts of Henry S. Halbert. In the late 1800s, Halbert lived with the Mississippi Choctaw. He had a strong interest in the Choctaw people, and spoke Choctaw fluently. His manuscripts represent a vast wealth of information for today's Choctaw people about our ancestors. This information, given from the mouths of Choctaw elders a century ago, includes in-depth descriptions of making and firing Choctaw pottery, Choctaws bows and arrows, Choctaw baskets, a detailed account of the way our ancestors used to plant their different types of gardens and the plants they put in each of them, recipes for many traditional Choctaw foods written in Choctaw and in English, funny stories, war stories, and funny war stories that go back into the 1700s, a complete muster role of the Choctaw soldiers who fought under Chief Pushmataha in the War of 1812, descriptions of ancient Choctaw dances no-longer remembered in today's communities, details on Choctaw house-building, name-giving, time-keeping, child-rearing, and much, much more. These unpublished manuscripts are arguably the best written source on Choctaw traditional life in existence, and there they sat in the Alabama State Archives! We would not have seen these if it was not for Chief Aufaumatauba's daughter bringing us through Montgomery.

Chief Aufaumatauba's daughter passed from this life at an early age, during one of the darkest points in Choctaw history. Her home was overrun, her grave was desecrated, and her remains shipped nearly 1,000 miles away and put in storage for 140 years. In the summer of 2010, through her repatriation, this woman has brought back a tremendous amount of information about Choctaw life to today's Choctaw communities, and has made the cultural departments of Choctaw tribes more aware of the many opportunities for cooperation we have with each other, and with other groups like the Smithsonian staff. Her remains are back at rest in a place that will be protected, but all of the good things that her repatriation has brought to light for Choctaw people will live on in upcoming generations.

Note - The Choctaw Nation Historic Preservation Department is already working on ways of making the information on Choctaw history and traditional life obtained at the Smithsonian and at the Alabama Archives available and accessible to tribal people in Oklahoma, including possible publication. However, the sheer volume and detail of this "new" information will require quite some time to completely process. For more information, please call 1-800-522-6170 ext. 2216.

Chief Pyle's Physical Fitness Challenge encourages healthy and active lifestyles

By CHRISSY DILL

The annual Labor Day Festival held at the Choctaw Nation capitol grounds in Tushka Homma is the site of many exciting activities for all ages. There is the promise of entertainment every year, and everyone who attends has a great time. The Chief Gregory E. Pyle Physical Fitness Challenge gives kids from the ages 8 to 18 the opportunity to get active and show off their physical abilities.

Jason Campbell created this event four years ago, and each year an average of 50-60 kids participate. "We hope to increase that number this year," commented Jason. Jason is the deputy director of the STAR (Success Through Academic Recognition) Program for the Choctaw Nation, which is an educational incentive program for the Choctaw youth. With the help of his fellow STAR Program employees, Jason organizes the Chief Pyle Physical Fitness Challenge each year.

The purpose behind the physical fitness challenge is to promote Chief Pyle's mission of encouraging healthy and active lifestyles for everyone, especially children.

"There's so many activities for the adults at Labor Day. The physical fitness challenge is another activity for the kids," explained Jason. The challenge consists of sportsoriented activities, but is open to everyone, not just sportslovers.

There are several activities that make up the challenge. The "most fun" event according to Jason is the 40-yard dash. "Everyone seems to talk about the 40-yard dash and looks forward to it," said Jason. The kids are separated into age groups and the boys and girls are not separated. Their 40-yard sprint is timed and a winner is determined. effort by Chief Pyle and the put on your time," said Jason.

The popular 40-yard dash is there to stay, but there are some activities that are improving this year. In the past, the kids competed in a vertical jump contest, a long jump and a 20yard shuttle. These will be replaced with plyometric boxes that measure jumping distance and height. The kids will also pull a "sled" to strengthen their legs, and there will be hurtles for them to leap.

"Plyometric exercises are to improve the kids' potential to excel in sports, but we're not promoting just athletics," said Jason. "We are promoting physical fitness."

The Chief Pyle Physical Fitness Challenge is another

"There's really an emphasis Choctaw Nation to promote physical fitness. The Choctaw Nation continues to encourage the fight against obesity, diabetes and heart disease. "We'd like to thank Chief Pyle and the Choctaw Nation for their support in this cause," said Ja-

> Registration for Chief Pyle's Physical Fitness Challenge is 5 p.m. Sept. 3 on the Council Chambers Lawn at Tushka Homma. The fitness challenge begins at 6 p.m.

> Jason and his friends in the STAR Program encourage the youth to participate in this exciting event on Labor Day. Each child that participates and finishes the challenge will receive a free T-shirt and jump
